RUSHING WORK.

Labor on Sewer Rapidly Nearing Completion.

RECOVER TOOLS LOST BY KONA

Preparations Made to Lay the Iron Pipe in One Continuous Length.

FLLOATING buoys now mark the surface of the water at the end of the long railroad wharf at the sewer outfall, beneath which are the engines, boilers, tools and other paraphernalia belonging to the pile-driver and coral-cutter, which were swept away during the heavy Kona storms a week ago. Diver Martin Lund, attired in his diving-suit, made a thorough search for the machinery on Tuesday and located every piece that had been lost. He attached ropes to such pieces as he was unable to raise to the surface, and floats were attached to them. The engineers of the outfall work will construct pontoons, install hoisting apparatus thereon and raise the machinery in a few days. The diver found the boiler 150 feet away from the derrick upon which it rested until swept away by the force of the waves. The huge hammer was found 100 feet distant with two heavy boulders resting upon it. All of the railroad iron in the 150 feet of track that succumbed to the terrific sweep of the water will be recovered.

On Tuesday C. H. Smith, the engineer in charge of the general construction work on the outfall, lowered the first piece of iron pipe, connecting with the stone pipe which has been laid for a distance of about 1,700 feet. The iron pipe is 34 feet in length, and is considered a short section. Others average about 80 feet. A diver had to be sent below with the pipe to lay it in concrete and make a proper connection with the first stone section. Rapid work is expected from now on. The pile-driving work, which is being done under contract by Cotton Bros., is advancing rapidly toward the bell buoy. The water is becoming very deep at the 1,800-foot mark, and the engineer says that pile-driving will be continued out, but 100 feet further. After that, pile-driving and coral-cutting will be abandoned. The coral reef commences sloping downward somewhat abruptly and near the bell buoy the sewer outlet will be 100 feet below the surface.

The iron pipe will not be lowered then section by section and jointed under the water, as at present. The pipes will be connected by what is known as the ball joints. Pontoons, catamaran-fashion, will be required in completing the work. The pipes will be joined and dropped into the water and down upon the coral foundation in much the same manner as a cable is laid. The piping thus connected will be as sinuous as a snake and will adapt itself to the coral floor. From investigations so far made it is thought that little difficulty will attend this method, as the coral is comparatively even in its long descent. Three derricks are at present rigged upon the double railroad track. Cotton Bros' pile-driver is at the extreme end of the pier, the coral-cutter is about 50 feet nearer the shore, and the dredger is just at the end of the completed stone pipe section. The material dredged is loaded into cars, which are pushed into the shore and dumped into the flat lands near the sewer engine-house. The coral-cutter consists of a huge steel knife shaped like a chisel and weighs about two tons. It is lifted in the same manner as a pile-driver and dropped with sufficient force to bury itself deep into the flinty coral. It is arranged on a horizontal sliding skid sufficient to allow for the cutting of a trench four feet wide.

The present engineer and his force have been engaged in the same work since December, but much of the time has been spent in getting their machinery together. The old railroad wharf, constructed while Wilson had charge of the work, had to be entirely gone over and strengthened.

Yesterday afternoon the waves ran quite high around the outworks and the wind whistled a merry tune through the derrick rigging. The work goes on under many difficulties, and not the least of these is the uncertainty in the weather. When the waves rush in with sweeping force, care has to be taken to prevent a disaster to the apparatus which goes under the surface.
